

I find it very difficult to understand why the marine national parks that Australia protects would be reduced. I understand they were established following an exhaustive scientific process and wide community consultation by progressive politicians who valued scientific opinion and cared about our natural environment. Surely the health of our oceans should be of utmost concern. We as human beings need to have more compassion towards our fellow creatures, if not, it will be to our own detriment. We can not just go on trashing and exploiting our natural environment for our own greed. In the long term I believe that reducing the size of the marine national parks will lead to dire consequences.

Sent from my iPad